Red stag hunt in Belarus 2024
Hunting area: : Bialowieska primeval forest
Europe's best hunting ground for old stags

Hunting area:

One of the last natural paradises of Europe is the Belarusian National Park Puszcza Bialowieska. This largest primeval forest in Europe is the pride of all Belarusians. You just have to imagine the dimensions of this hunting area. On the Belarusian side alone, the national park is about 180,000 ha, of which about 90,000 ha are closed forest areas. Since the beginning of the nineties we have had this hunting ground under contract for our customers. It is located directly on the border Brest/Terespol and 350 km southwest of Minsk. The capital Minsk is served daily by European airlines. With an area of 180,000 ha, the Bialowieska Primeval Forest is today the last extensively preserved mixed forest complex of natural character in the European lowlands. After the loss of Polish independence at the end of the 17th century, the entire primeval forest was located on Russian territory. During this period, significant areas of the eastern part were given to dignitaries of the Tsarist Empire and deforested. Only in the second half of the 19th century these areas became the property of the Russian Tsar and were placed under strict protection as a sovereign hunting ground. Until the dissolution of the Soviet Union in 1991, eastern part of the primeval forest was granted the status of a state hunting and conservation forest and served as a hunting ground for high officials from politics and business. Timber extraction was limited to the use of dead wood. Thanks to this regulation, large areas of old tree populations were preserved there. The treaty, which sealed the end of the Soviet Union, was signed in 1991 in the village of Wiskuli in the Bjelovesch primeval forest. The independent Republic of Belarus declared its part of the primeval forest a national park over its entire area. In 1992, UNESCO recognized the entire complex of the Bjelovesch primeval forest as the first transboundary world heritage site. It includes the national parks „Bialowieski Park Narodowy“ (Poland) and „Bielawieskaja Puszcza“ (Belarus). In addition, cooperation was initiated to unify the protection regulations on both sides of the border. The primeval forest in the classical sense is already worth seeing. There, fallen giant trees remain on the ground, thus giving new life light, space and cover. Here everything grows as nature intended, no forester puts an axe to a tree here. The forest feels well, the game too, and the Belarusians are proud of this paradise.

The Red Deer:

Especially close to the hearts of the Belarusian foresters is the care of the red deer. They are experienced experts, known far beyond the borders of the country, who know their trade. There are also several wildlife biologists employed in the National Park, who constantly monitor the game populations. Even experienced German red deer experts who have hunted there have the highest respect for the achievements and success of their Belarusian colleagues. One of the advantages is certainly the size of the area, which can be uniformly managed in terms of hunting. Strict hunting and shooting guidelines, combined with natural selection through harsh winters and wolves, have created an unparalleled red deer population. Nowhere else in Europe do red deer have better conditions to grow old than in this primeval jungle. The rut takes place in September and for the local hunters this is one of the highlights of the hunting year. Then everything is on the runs, which counts itself to the ‚deer-fair guild‘. The most promising way of hunting is stalking, and if you have mastered the reputation of the deer you can put your skills to best use here. Nowhere else in Europe do you have such optimal conditions. You will be surprised how close you will be brought to the rutting stag. The special feature of untouched nature and complete peace and quiet is reflected in the trophy weights. The average weight is between 8 kg and 11 kg, but every year, secret stags with stronger antler weights, which were never seen before in the deep jungle, are brought down. When we describe the antlers of the ‚jungle deer‘, some peculiarities stand out. The main antlers are mostly dark and well beaded. The crowns of the jungle deer are mighty and the sticks are comparatively thick. In 25 years of close cooperation between WESTFALIA JAGDREISEN and the Bjelovescher primeval forest, many a hunter has happily returned with his life deer from the world natural heritage.

Other game species:

This terrain is also ideally suited for wild boars. On the few driven hunts, we see every year what capital Keiler this jungle produces. There are large thickening complexes of many thousands of hectares, abundant grazing and low hunting pressure. Here the Keiler can still grow old and strong. Wolves prefer Frischlinge and young boars as food, because Keiler are well-fortified and the wolves know that exactly. Roe deer occurs, plays only a subordinate role hunt-wise, however. A landmark of this jungle is the bison.

Full of pride the Belarusians look at this last European wild cattle. Nearly extinct, the population today numbers over 500. Meanwhile, there are licenses for old bulls and cows, these shootings are then very much in demand. The very good moose game population rounds off the original European game population in its perfection. This can also be hunted in the jungle. The jungle of Bjelowesch! This is still today one of the most fascinating hunting grounds in Europe. All free game and of incredible dimensions.
